Trust, and get the job done. Don't fret over WFH vs office

Cos Must Focus On Measurable Output, Work, Not Place Of Ops

By Tarun Rai

In what is the most telling piece of research that lays open the crux of the issue of working from home or at office, a large majority of company leaders believe productivity suffers when employees work remotely while an even larger majority of employees believe exactly the opposite.

What productivity means: Joining this debate from the side of RTO (return to office) are global leaders like Jamie Dimon, Elon Musk, Jeff Bezos and Mark Zuckerberg — so, how can the question of employee productivity be so polarised? Clearly, across companies, the key performance indicators are not clear and agreed upon. The performance objectives are not SMART — specific, measurable, achievable, relevant and time-bound.

And frankly, it amazes me how much time is being devoted to where the work should be done from as opposed to the very little discussion and debate on the 'work' itself, which is defining and agreeing on how to measure productivity.

In all my years of work life, I have never given any importance to office attendance — whether it is coming to office on time, or at all. And never once did I feel that anyone took advantage of my, rather, lax approach to attendance. For me, the only important criterion was that the work was getting done. I trusted my direct reports with the delivery of ambitious business targets — how could I not trust them to manage their own time?

Geography is History: Way before the lockdown, I championed 'liberating talent from the confines of geography'. Sounds dramatic, I know, but it was very important. We had offices in all the metros and because of our city P&L structure, talent of a particular office was deployed only for clients of that city. It just wasn't optimal or efficient. So, the strapline of the launch of the original satellite phone — "Now, geography is history" — became a regular slide in my presentations. We started to practice it actively, with talent being deployed across cities depending on the need.

Past-forward to a meeting during the lockdown with one of our clients based in Kolkata. Attending the meeting with me from our team in Bangalore, our strategy lead from Delhi, our creative head and his team from Bangalore, two of our specialists from our London office, two of the client's consultants from Europe and I, from Mumbai. All working from home, of course.

The first thing I told the client was that had it not been for the lockdown and how it has changed the way we work, we would have taken a couple of months just to get such a team together — and it would have been much too expensive in any case. Now, we had the best resources from all over India and across the world at such short notice. Geography was, definitely, history.

Better yet, faster and more efficient access to talent is just one of the many advantages of remote work. Not having to spend unproductive hours travelling to work every day is another. Sure, there may be issues around private spaces at home, or of internet speeds. But then, people should have the option to work from office — when they want, and how frequently they want.

The key issue remains... trust. Do you trust your people to manage time while delivering on their SMART objectives? So, let the conversation be about measurable output — the 'work' — and not about the place.
